361 166 gards the Choroti, he, on Karsten's authority, mentions the interesting fact that these Indians sometimes are compelled to make a change of dwelling-site only on account of the appearance of excessive swarms of noxious insects (principally locusts).[1]

484 464 It is only in later times that the Choroti to any greater extent have come in to work on white men's sugar plantations. These plantations are mostly situated in Argentine territory, and therefore the Indians often have to make journeys of several weeks, in going to, or returning from, their place of work. Such Indians as go to the plantations only work for a few months for the whites, and then return to their own locations, there to spend the rest of the year in the wilds of the Chaco. Whilst at the plantations, they live in Indian villages they build for themselves, and in many ways carry on their primitive life.

166 I will also mention two other reasons for migration; now, however, only seldom obtaining among the Choroti, viz., fear of other Indian tribes and of reprisals for misdeeds committed against the whites. Concerning the latter cause for migration, I have already mentioned that a part of the Choroti tribe disappeared into the interior of the Chaco, after having in some way transgressed against white people who had settled in their country.

439 The Choroti Indians also engage in trading, and their chief article of barter is dried fish. In the Pilcomayo they are able to catch more fish than are required for their own consumption, and they therefore dry the surplus and take it to other parts, inhabited by Chiriguano and Chané, where fish is less plentiful. These latter Indians buy the fish by giving in exchange maize, red colouring-stuff (for face-painting) and other articles. Nowadays the Choroti also obtain iron, clothing, and other wares, by trading with the whites at the sugar plantations.

The snail-shell spangles that have been described in the foregoing are an important article of trade in the Chaco. The Choroti, according to their own stating, obtain spangles — separate, as well as strung into ready-made necklaces — from tribes living in the eastern Chaco. On Rio Parapiti Nordenskiöld has seen spangles of this kind among the Tapiete Indians, who told him they had got them by barter from the Ashluslay, and the latter that they, in their turn, had obtained them

[1] Nimuendajú (I), p. 35.